It also runs 28 specialised International Scientific Committees on a variety of subjects.

One of these is the International Committee on Intangible Cultural Heritage which, within the mandate of ICOMOS as an organisation concerned with the conservation of monuments and sites, specialises in the protection of sites that have intangible values and in so doing the conservation of the intangible that gives value to certain monuments and sites.

The ICOMOS International Secretariat and its specialized Documentation Centre are located in Paris (France).

- Documentation of ICH.
- Perpetuation and transmission of the ICH aspects of a site.
- Strengthening and revitalisation of ICH practices.
- Identification of the conservation measures that are needed on a site in order to ensure that associated cultural practices can continue
- Recognition and strengthening of traditional land management systems (in themselves often an important aspect of intangible cultural heritage) as a means of conserving a site and associated ICH practices.
- The recognition by national and other conservation authorities of traditional and/or communal custodians as the appropriate managers and protectors/conservators of sites and associated ICH practices.
- Management of outside impacts on sites and associated ICH practices and the legal and other measures most appropriate to governing these.
- Where appropriate, the training of community members in conventional heritage conservation practice, tourism management, etc. in order to retain community control of valuable sites and/or ensure appropriate integration of contemporary conservation methods with traditional management systems.

Through its work as an advisory body to the World Heritage Committee, whilst acknowledged as being different from potential work as an advisory body under the Intangible Cultural Heritage Convention, and its other international activities ICOMOS members routinely work with issues associated with community heritage and international standards and governance systems for conservation of heritage, both tangible and intangible.

Question 6.c of the Questionnaire: Description of the organizations activities

ICOMOS' activities in the area of Intangible Cultural Heritage (ICH) have been very directly prompted by, and are in many ways a response to, the statement made in the preamble to the UNESCO Intangible Cultural Heritage Convention: "Considering the deep-seated interdependence between the intangible cultural heritage and the tangible cultural and natural heritage, ..."

Many ICOMOS members, who are specialists in the management of sites with intangible cultural heritage associations, were members of their national delegations in the drafting process of the ICH Convention. This, along with growing awareness of the importance of ICH, stimulated activity within ICOMOS in this area over the past decade.

The core business of ICOMOS and its members is the conservation of monuments and sites and the development of standards of professional practice and networks in the many and varied areas of specialisation associated therewith. In recent years, ICH has become an integral part of its work and is an established area of professional specialisation within the organisation. In this regard the principal concern of ICOMOS is the manner in which appropriate and adequate protection of sites can strengthen and perpetuate intangible heritage practices associated therewith.

Key activities of the organisation in this area include:

- Debate and discussion around ICH and its associations with monuments and sites. eg: ICH was the focus of the 2003 ICOMOS General Assembly Symposium at Victoria Falls on the theme, 'Place Memory and Meaning' and before, and since then, countless national and international seminars and workshops of the organisation and its various national and international branches have focussed on the issue (see http://www.international.icomos.org/victoriafalls2003/home_eng.htm). It will in October 2008 again be the focus of the 16th ICOMOS General Assembly Symposium, taking place in Quebec, under the theme 'The Spirit of Place' (see <http://quebec2008.icomos.org>)
- The development of national and international standards of professional practice in the field of conservation of monuments and sites associated with ICH values. In this regard, the 'Kimberley Declaration' of 2003 was developed as an initial response and is currently being followed by the development of an international charter, or doctrinal text on the conservation of sites with ICH value. Several national committees of ICOMOS have also incorporated issues concerning ICH into national charters for best practice in heritage conservation, eg. ICOMOS Australia's well-known Burra Charter.
- The establishment of a networks of experts and specialists in the area of conservation of sites with ICH values. In October 2005, ICOMOS formed its International Committee on Intangible Cultural Heritage (ICICH) which brings together the members of the organisation who specialise in the conservation of sites with ICH values.
- The evaluation of sites with ICH values both as part of ICOMOS' duties as an advisory body to the World Heritage Committee and generally as a specialist body that is regularly consulted by governments and others concerned with such sites, whether at local, national or international level.
- In similar manner to the above, providing expert assistance in areas associated with sites that have ICH values, eg: development of management plans, legal protective measures, tourism strategies, site interpretation, etc.

Whilst ICICH is the principle organ of ICOMOS dealing with ICH matters, other specialist committees, most notably those on tourism management, interpretation and the legal aspects of heritage conservation, have also contributed significantly to the development of professional expertise and understanding of issues relating to the management and conservation of sites with intangible cultural heritage values. They are regularly involved in activities associated therewith.
